The problem of evaluating the potential of a drug is frequently addressed by the Pharmaceutical and Food Administration (PFA) and in European legislation, e.g. by the requirements of the EMEA. Methods used for analyzing the potential of a new drug are especially of importance in the field of the pharmaceutical industry, since the development of a new drug must have the property to be effective under a broad range of conditions. The primary purpose of pharmaceutical research is to develop compounds that will prevent or cure disease. Current pharmaceutical research is directed towards screening large numbers of compounds against the target. The new compound then has to demonstrate efficacy in a further series of studies that aim to understand the reasons for its effects. With the large number of compounds and a potentially long development cycle, the industrial expert becomes increasingly important. An expert may act as a role model for a new class of compounds and can thereby define the kind of molecules that are to be developed. In the pharmaceutical industry, it is generally assumed that the majority of drugs are developed for affecting the cell membrane of the microorganism or the corresponding cell of a human. However, it has now been demonstrated that only about 10% of all currently approved drug products target or act at the membrane of microorganisms (F. C. H. Chung et al., Mol. Micro
